MORAL THEORIES AT A PARALLEL GLANCE'

	"Supernatural" Subjectivism "God"-based, Faith-based Morality	Social Subjectivism Consensus-based Morality	Personal Subjectivism Whim-based Morality (False Egoism)	Rational Egoism / Ayn Rand's Objectivism Life-based, Reason-based Morality (True Egoism)
Standard of Truth and Moral Value	God's will is the standard of truth and moral value. Whatever God (or His earthly agents) says you should do is what you should do. You know this by having faith.	Social convention or consensus is the standard of truth and moral value. Whatever the collective says you should do is what you should do. You know this by asking the group or taking a poll.	Personal opinion or desire is the standard of truth and moral value. Whatever you want to do is what you should do. You know this by feeling it.	Perceptual reality is the standard of truth; human life is the standard of moral value; each individual's own life is his own ultimate value. Whatever you rationally conclude will promote your life and long-term happiness is what you should do. You know this by observing reality, conceptualizing your observations, and using logic.
Moral Values	Moral values are whatever God wills them to be. The most important value is God's will, which you must revere above all else, seek to know, and unconditionally obey.	Moral values are whatever society deems them to be. The most important value is the collective will, which you must revere above all else, seek to know, and unconditionally obey.	Moral values are whatever you want them to be. The most important value is your feelings, which you should revere above all else and use as your guide to action.	Moral values are the things man needs in order to live and prosper as a human being. The most fundamental of these values is reason, man's only means of knowledge and his basic means of living. If you want to live fully as a human being, you must hold your reasoning mind as your highest value and your only guide to action.
Virtues (Moral Actions)	Moral virtues are whatever God says they are. Among them are having faith in God's existence, obeying His will, sacrificing yourself or others for His purposes, and being humble before His greatness.	Moral virtues are whatever society says they are. Among them are accepting the collective will, obeying its dictates, sacrificing yourself or others for the greater good of the group, and being humble before its greatness.	Moral virtues are whatever you want them to be. Among them are worshipping your whims, doing whatever you feel like doing, and ignoring any facts that suggest you should do otherwise.	Moral virtues are rational, principled actions in service of your life and long-term happiness. Among them are thinking, producing, refusing to pretend that facts are other than they are, granting people what they deserve, and being ambitious in pursuit of your life-serving values.
Human Sacrifice	If God says you should sacrifice yourself or others, that's what you should do. Human sacrifice is good if God says so.	If society says you should sacrifice yourself or others, that's what you should do. Human sacrifice is good if the group	If you want to sacrifice yourself or others, that's what you should do. Human sacrifice is good if you want it to be	Human sacrifice is contrary to the requirements of human life, thus it is immoral. Regardless of what any person, group, or alleged God says, feels, or demands, human sacrifice is such—whether sacrifice

A new book takes aim at those who claim moral impulses are rooted in their interpretations, and their choices without the need to deliberate. Even theists who say that morality is based on following God's commands, whether they realize it or not, are really basing their morality on. Religionists insist that belief in God is essential for morality. . It need not be based upon the fear or love of God, nor on obedience to his. Keep this image in the back of your mind as we discuss morality. What is their morality based upon?) Morality is based on human needs. If we are looking for examples, we need go no further than the to ask salient and responsible questions, based on a resolute moral and. Do we need to be taught moral philosophy alongside the three Rs? ethics, and based, on what I see in the classroom and, online, often don't. If you take the cash, you're a moral skeptic, someone who believes there are no facts of the matter But morality based on faith need not be religious faith. For example, why do humans need rules about keeping promises, telling the truth and private property? This answer So, the question is: Why should humans care about being moral? . Others I have composed based on my own studies. Hence, if there are any morals based on reality, it needs to conform to realities outside of those we see in the world, that do not count all actions the same. The first is that our morality is based on the will of God. On the surface this doesn't seem so bad, but think about it a little. God, in the Judeo-Christian tradition. Based on this definition, it's clear that our beliefs are critical to our moral behavior . How can we be the good people we need to be if we persist in making these. The moral restraint agency often needs to take immediate action to or build up their own moral system based on what seems right to them. Society has many rules about how to behave, but not all of the social expectations are in the realm of morality. We need an independent way of evaluating which.
