The center cannot hold: American studies and global feminism

The author of the article argues that the Western communities produce and direct global feminism. This is because different aspects of global feminism are affected by theories that focus on the society, culture, and economics of western. The American female writers have introduced other elements of global feminisms such as race and ethnicity. Global feminism had not embraced the contribution of the women of color in the social movements until recently. For example, studies about their culture and immigration experiences in the US were previously neglected. The author has offered various alternatives in order to come up with a critically reflective global feminism. One alternative offered by the author includes incorporating various factors such as eating disorders, medical conditions, and self-destruction in global feminism. One of the medical conditions that results from body image issues includes anorexia nervosa. The medical condition occurs when females starve themselves so that they can achieve a standard global beauty standard. The eating disorders have spread to most part of the parts of the world. It usually affects women belonging to specific classes. For instance, it now affects females in India, Taipei, and Philippines. The author believes that the contemporary hallucination of the modern beauty is strongly influenced by the market world. The image of a woman is not edited by westernization only. It has been a continuous process that is now a widely recognized global female culture that should be addressed in global feminism (Lin-tim 27).

Global feminist and transitional identity politics Weir
