

The Designed Self: Psychoanalysis And Contemporary Identities

Has the Conservative Party lost its Soul?
A Political Psychology of Conservative Party Identity Crisis and Change

Ayla Michelle Demir (March 2015) PhD Research Proposal

PhD Political Psychology, University of East London.

A highly qualified and motivated psychology postgraduate developing an interdisciplinary psycho-political research project, engaged with senior Conservative MPs working in Parliament central government and with high profile UKIP politicians in the media spot light, exploring reconstructions of the Conservative Party's ideological and political identity, constructions of UKIP ideology/identity and emerging representations of authentic English national identity.

This political psychology research is central to UEL's interdisciplinary strategic research interests and it is aligned with the UEL Vision & Strategy Research Theme 'Politics Culture Society' and key Research Topics of Social Change, Popular Culture and Identity Construction. It should be based within the School of Psychology and intellectually supported by the team of psychologists working in the UEL Psychology and Social Change Research Group (PSCRG); the Identity, Performance and Social Action Research Project; and the Centre for Social Justice and Change.

Collaborating with Psychoanalytic and Psychosocial Sociologists and Critical/Discursive Political Scientists in the School of Social Science, it will contribute to the Psychoanalytic Studies Research Group and the Psychosocial Studies Research Group, researching the influence of contemporary political identities on multiculturalism. It also plugs into UEL Centre on Migration, Refugees and Belonging (CMRB), researching the politics of belonging, identities and nationalism.

Also, there is a unique partnership between the University of East London, my training centre The Tavistock & Portman NHS Foundation Trust, and my former university Birkbeck College, University of London, with the latter two participating in the inter-institutional research of UEL Politics, Culture, Society research group.
