

I Only Work Here: Five Decades Of Poetry In Four Styles

RL First of all, perhaps most importantly, I believe anger is beautiful. I think it's an exquisite emotion that we need to respect and honor and celebrate more. If someone is angry it's usually for a damn good reason. Whether they handle it well or it's justifiable, that's another story, but anger is as much a song as anything else is, and it's really important to honor it.

MS But you can't describe what your anger was responding to in this case as beautiful.

RL Well no, but I'm just saying that it takes, especially women, a long time to embody anger and to claim it as our own without apology because we're always told to smile and make nice.

But I want to get back to answering your beauty question. So, my dad, born in 1923 in New Orleans, saw a lot of things that no person should ever have to see, like most people born during that time: the Klan, murders, he was drafted for the war when he was still a teenager, he was one of the people to "liberate the Jews" during World War II. Right after he came back, he was forced into labor at Charity Hospital, cleaning the mess pans of white veterans who had shot at him during World War II in so-called friendly fire. He saw a lot.

For my whole life I was constantly at the table with my father, talking, and him telling me his stories. And I used to always say, "Dad, I don't understand, though, because if all what you say is true, why do you laugh all the time?" And that's why that poem "Second Line" is in the book. Because this man constantly laughed. He was a very jolly, good fellow, and I never was able to understand that because I romanticize my pain (laughter). And he didn't make light of his, not by any means—but he constantly just brushed the flies away like, "Oh girl, please." And I always, and still do, admire that so much, because joy was a weapon for him. He used his joy to fight the demons in himself and in the world.
